

The cost of caregiving isn't always on the homecare bill.

When a loved one experiences a care event, the impact it can have can reach far beyond medical expenses. Family members who step in to provide care may reduce work hours, miss time with their own family, or end up taking on some of the financial burden themselves.

Long-term care planning is more than figuring out what will pay for care. It's about providing a plan that can help reduce the financial and emotional strain on everyone in the family.

Have you seen caregiving impact someone in your life? Let's talk about strategies that can help families prepare before an event like this occurs.
